Excerpt: .and piquancy in the process of translation and it may well be that a foreigner loses some of the subtler associations which these household words have for those familiar with them as part of the intellectual heritage left them by their fathers. Many of the proverbs given in the present work have a more or less restricted interest and betray their origin by reference to social conditions of purely local origin. Others, again, by their bearing on certain fundamental characteristics of human nature or certain universal generalisations of the human mind have their easily recognisable analogues elsewhere. Many such instances will spontaneously strike the reader. In other cases the author has taken pains to render a particular proverb into its European equivalent. The Rev. E. S. Oakley, Principal of the Ramsay College at Almora, has contributed to the book a short introduction, describing the physical...
